

Pavlov's Cats

by Robert Joseph Ahola

When two well-intended but meddlesome apprentice angels set out to prove their respective philosophical points of view, they make the untenable error of trying to prove them with the very human beings they've been entrusted to help.

Of the two angels, Fidel (the male) firmly believes in his theory of Nanotology —that all major events in life hinge on decisions made in infinitesimal moments in time, and it is upon those nanoseconds that all events turn.

The female, Catrina, on the other hand ridicules Fidel's theory, choosing instead to believe that all human beings fall into two categories — cats and dogs — and that the "cats" in the human world are the only creatures with the initiative to think outside the box that life has built for them.

Assigned by the archangel Gabriela to act as guides and angelic counselors to a high profile, high-strung quartet of young men and women, Fidel and Catrina are cautioned about the dangers of interfering in the traffic of human emotion. Especially since these human beings are intelligent, headstrong and driven to success, they are also inclined to exercise the gift of free will with reckless abandon. As a result our watchful celestial messengers are very hard pressed to get them to follow the paths for which they are presumably destined.

In their attempts to help their charges, these angels are willing to resort to any means necessary. That extension of energy alone conjures Lucifer himself. And when the Devil enters the equation, anything can happen.

A comedy in three acts, Pavlov's Cats, proves to be as willful, as spontaneous and as joyously unpredictable as its name implies.
