

Jeff Divine, the founding director of a college theater, has passed away – but his influence lives in the members of his drama studio. A fun loving man, with an engaging wit and sarcastic sense of humor, he instilled in his students a love of all things theatrical – from well-written words, to cleaning up the stage after the performance. In his final director's notes, read by students representing different stages of his career, he reveals his keen, almost mystical, powers of observation, and insight into their lives.
